INTO A LIFE-CHANGING
RELATIONSHIP WITH JESUS CHRIST.

Heaven Is Worth It: Lessons From The Life of Adoniram Judson

It takes a certain kind of man to choose the narrow path away from wealth, comfort, and reputation and sail into missionary obscurity —only to see six years pass with no converts.

Adoniram Judson (1788 – 1850), America's first overseas missionary, dared to dream big for the kingdom of God. In a day when missionary work was uncharted territory for many, Judson set his heart on reaching the people of Burma (modern-day Myanmar) with the gospel. But what he did not expect were the dark days ahead. No immediate fruit awaited him, but unimaginable suffering.

The Call and the Cost

Before boarding the ship to Burma, Judson famously wrote a letter asking for Ann Hasseltine's hand in marriage. But it wasn't romantic in the way most would expect. He warned her father of the dangers she would face—poverty, loneliness, disease, perhaps even death. He wrote with clarity: “Can you consent to her exposure to the dangers of the ocean... to every kind of want and distress... to degradation, insult, persecution, and perhaps a violent death?”

By God's providence, Ann and her father said yes. And together, Adoniram and Ann sailed for a land they had never seen, to proclaim a salvation the land of Burma needed to hear.

They dreamed of souls won to Christ, churches planted, and Scripture in Burmese hands. But dreams, in God's sovereignty, are often shaped by the fires of trials.

The Depth of Suffering

In Burma, Judson labored for six long years before finally seeing a single person come to Christ. The mission was slow, the ground hard, and the conditions harsh. He buried several children. Then, Ann died. Later, his second wife would also die. He was imprisoned in filthy conditions, surviving brutal beatings and near-starvation. At one point, overwhelmed by grief, he dug a grave and sat beside it for days—grieving, praying, and wondering whether his work was in vain.

Yet he did not give up.

With limited resources, health in deterioration he translated the entire Bible into Burmese—a translation still in use today. He also compiled a Burmese-English dictionary. And most of all, he kept preaching, kept loving, kept serving. Because Adoniram Judson believed that the unsurpassable joys of heaven was worth it.

“His life was a seed—buried in the ground, dying to self—so that others might reap the fruit.”

The Legacy That Remains

When Judson finally passed, a handful of believers had grown into thousands. The church in Burma began to multiply. Today, millions of Burmese Christians trace their spiritual roots to his labor and ministry. His life was a seed—buried in the ground, dying to self—so that others might reap the fruit. Judson once said, “The future is as bright as the promises of God.” He never saw the fullness of the fruit in his lifetime. But eternity will tell of the countless lives changed because he believed, endured, and obeyed.

The Call to Us Today

We may not be called to Burma. But we are called to live for something far greater than comfort.

The gospel invites us into a certain kind of life that lifts our eyes beyond temporary pleasures and toward eternal joy. Not all of us will cross the seas with the gospel—but all of us are called to cross the street with gospel. To love, to give, to serve, and be surrendered to God's purposes, willing to be spent for His glory.

So let's dream big, suffer well, and press on—not for applause, but for the glory of our King and the imperishable rewards and joys that await us.
